The Visitor

She jumped up from her bed as the sound of the doorbell echoed throughout the house. She climbed down the steep staircase into the winding hallway, she saw two figures enter her large home. One of these was tremendously tall compared to her, (though most people were) and the other was about the same size as her with giant ears and light brown hair, but an extremely spiteful face.

Her parents led the tall woman into the kitchen and left her with the other creature.

For a while the two sat silently until he directed a scowling gaze towards her and she stood up. Much to her horror he copied her in doing this. Suddenly, he darted towards her and she ran for her life. Every step she took her heart pounded. Her blood was pumping faster and faster. She headed for the tiny back door. Her feet landed on the soft wet grass. He was only feet behind.

There was nowhere else to run.

She trembled in the corner as he came closer and closer. A surge of adrenalin empowered her. She leaped right over him with inches to spare and ran once again.

For a few seconds he stood motionless in a puzzled daze but that was long enough for her to clamber halfway up a nearby tree.

He barked recklessly at the bottom of the tree knowing he was unable to climb it. She purred comfortably and nestled herself between the branches, her long black coat rustling in the wind.

A motherly voice came from nearby "Kitty! What happened?" She picked Kitty up and took her inside.
